

"you should have,"
she said, "it would have saved you a lot of agony."

soon there was a knock on the door, and soon another, and they started arriving — many of the famous:
a famous cartoonist, a famous columnist, a famous actor ...

soon they were all about,
especially in the patio where food was being served.

I'm lucky to be here,
I thought, I could never afford a place like this.

I told the lady that I was retiring early and I took a fifth of whiskey to the bedroom, had a few drinks
in the dark
then switched on her cable tv
and watched it while finishing the fifth

after the lady went to work the next day
I got into my car
and drove slowly out of those Hollywood hills
knowing I'd never go back there

and I got back into town
to my front court
with the busted
windows and I got inside

locked the door
got a tall
can of beer
from the refrigerator
opened it had a hit sitting there at 10:30 a.m.
on that derelect couch

it was one of the best cans of beer
I ever
tasted.

MY DOCTOR

I walked into the waiting room.
it was full.
mostly of old
dying women.

I went up to the receptionist:
"where the hell is he?"

"I don't know," she said,
"he hasn't phoned in or anything.
these people have been waiting for hours."

I walked out and down the stairway,
got into my car and drove to the racetrack.

I parked, paid for clubhouse, went in and saw him standing there with a hotdog and a beer.

he saw me: "Henry, can I buy you a hotdog and a beer?"

"listen," I told him, "I was waiting in your office.
you weren't there but there were eleven old dying women in your waiting room."

"Martha will give them new appointments," he said.

I walked over to the stands, sat down and studied the Form

my doctor appeared with a hotdog and a beer.
"for you," he said.

"thank you," I said.

"it gets so depressing," he told me, "there's this old woman, she's got cancer of the ass.
anybody else would die!
she just won't die!
I don't know what to do with her!"

"bill her," I said.

"Martha takes care of
that," he answered.
"who do you like in this race?"

"I favor the six,"
I told him.

"the nine should win
by daylight," he said.
"by the way, why did you make an appointment to see me?"

"cancer of the ass,"
I told him.

"you're a very funny man," he said. "you're one of my favorite patients.

"have you ever screwed Martha?" I asked.

"of course," he answered,
"you like her?"

"except when she bills
me," I told him.

"I think it's the nine horse," he said.

"you already bet?"
I asked.

"sure," he said.

I got up to bet,
came back
just in time to see them break from the gate —
which my six stumbled getting out of.

anyhow, the nine
won by daylight.

my doctor got up
to cash.

I tried to remember what I had gone
to see him about.

then he was back
he handed me another
hotdog and beer.
then he sat
down.

he started talking about what a horrible woman
his wife was.
